Solid Waste Service Overview

- City contracted with IESI TX Corporation in November of 2000 for residential and commercial services.
- Council policy directive in 2000 was to keep residential rates low by providing a good business opportunity for commercial services in the City Limits, these commercial accounts are billed directly by the contractor. Residential and small scale commercial are billed through the City.
- There have been 8 contract amendments to date and several corporate name changes, but the core agreement remains.
- Service has generally been high quality. Concerns related to training new employees of the contractor and educating the citizens have been successful in improving occasional customer service concerns.
- As per discussions during the budget process, staff recommends a two year extension, keeping rates the same, but creating options for Council consideration.
- The proposed 9th amendment is included in the Council packet and recommended for action on January 19, 2021, extending the contract to February 15, 2023 with no increase in the charge to the City by the Contractor.

RE: POTENTIAL FOR AND COST OF LOBBYING & MONITORING EFFORTS

FROM: John Godwin, Management Consultant

SUMMARY: Senator Hall's "No TML" proposal would increase the cost to Terrell taxpayers of monitoring and assuring compliance with the state legislature from $3,487 to $160,000.

Discussion

The proposed SB 29 appears to be a clear attempt by some to limit input from Texas cities to the state legislature. Citizens elect a mayor and council members to represent them on city council. The mayor and council use a variety of means to communicate the concerns of the city as an entity to the state legislature. This function is important partly because the legislature is fond of passing unfunded mandates to cities. If a state senator brags about getting something done it is often because he passed a state law or directed the eventual passage of a state regulation that raises the costs of local governments. Cities need a voice in the world of taxing, borrowing and spending in order to weigh in on the costs of complying with the wishes of the state legislature. The notion is that TML member cities are spending taxpayer dollars to support and oppose issue positions not always supported by all of their citizens. The City of Terrell's annual membership is $3,487. That is of course true—but no political entities have 100% agreement from their electorate. That is how representative government works. But we must keep in mind that local government officials, who also run for office in non-partisan elections, are much closer to their voters than those serving in the Texas legislature. We have locally elected officials who do their best to serve their cities, and if the voters think they failed, they can be removed. Shutting cities out of the process diminishes the voice on which Texas voters depend, especially those in smaller municipalities. Cities like Terrell must be able to address our legislators and do so in aggregate numbers. Legislators should crave that input, to accept or reject, but to fairly and fully hear and consider. Failing that, there will be a chilling effect on Texas cities, in which a vast majority of growth and economic development has and always will occur in Texas. Any truly caring, interested senator or representative should seek out cities' perspectives before they undertake legislation regarding taxes, spending, regulations, mandates, and more.

Most cities that use a lobbyist hire a consultant(s) who specialize in this service and often in a specific area such as taxing, public safety, transportation, legislative actions, grant opportunities, administrative findings and rulemaking, etc. These consultants regularly monitor state activity, both in the legislative and executive branches, and then when the city believes an action by the state or federal government will have a negative effect on their community, they undertake efforts to improve or even defeat said action. In the data I found, the larger cities spend quite a bit on contract lobbying, which necessarily encompasses monitoring, including: Arlington, $80,000; Fort Worth, $224,000; Dallas, $280,000; Plano, $40,000+; and Frisco and McKinney, about the same as Plano. They lobby for many of the same things Terrell cares about, of course, but it is difficult to compare Terrell to these larger jurisdictions because so much of their lobbying efforts are federal-related. For example, one of Fort Worth's biggest priorities is defense spending. These cities generally use professional lobbyists instead of in-house staff because of their expertise, connections, large swings in work demand, and ability to focus on specific areas. These consultants vary as to whom they report as well, depending on the functional area addressed.

Medium and smaller cities often create a legislative priorities statement or program, typically drafted by staff and approved by the city council. The City of Coppell recently approved its legislative agenda, for example. Cities also use professional organizations like TML, BOAT, TRAPS, etc. to promote their unique interests and concerns. In those cases individual staff members are often the liaisons to those organizations. Cities often use city secretaries or public information officers to monitor state executive and legislative activities, as well as their city attorneys, typically working through their own statewide professional organization, to learn about major new legislation, actions by executive and administrative departments, and important judicial decisions that affect how we do business. It is not unusual to similarly depend on engineers or others for transportation issues, although to a much smaller degree. Once issues are identified, the city can take appropriate actions, including calls or other correspondence from the city manager or mayor, passing council resolutions, testifying at committee hearings, appearing before administrative bodies, etc. This is Coppell's plan, working directly with their legislative delegation and various state executives, consistent with its own unique legislative agenda. But Coppell knows they cannot do it all alone.

Amidst some legislators' desire to quieten cities, it is easy to lose sight of the executive impact of state actions. The executive branch is "in session" every year and all year long, so they need much scrutiny too. Through no malicious intent, executive and administrative offices and bureaucrats, who typically answer to no voters at any level, make far-reaching and potentially damaging decisions, rulings, and interpretations. These include unfunded mandates and complex regulatory requirements, as well as poor interpretations of legislative actions. Therefore, it is imperative that we monitor these activities too, and provide explanation and perspective to those state employees in their decision-making and enforcement processes. That is very difficult without someone in Austin with great knowledge to monitor executive meetings and actions on an almost full-time basis. Trying to do so from Terrell is impossible; paying someone in Austin is cost prohibitive. Again, this is especially significant to all but the largest Texas cities, which can afford to pay experts and will hire such professionals in any case.

Even without TML's very valuable work, it seems unlikely a city the size of Terrell would need to hire a full-time, in-house lobbyist/monitor. The size of the community, the ability of the city to effect changes acting alone, the expertise that would be required from a single person to be successful, the size and complexity of state bureaucracy, and the nature of the state legislature's biennial 180-day sessions all lend themselves to either contracting out such services, or folding them into the responsibilities of other staff and consultants. For example, the city secretary could monitor overall legislative activity, probably through TML, which would hopefully still be able to provide timely information. The city engineer, development services director, city attorney, and even myself or other consultants like FNI or our water attorneys could monitor certain areas and issue calls for possible action. Of course the most effective method for pressing the city's concerns would be in conjunction with other area municipalities, as is being done now in Kaufman County regarding this current lobbying bill. On a larger scale, this idea of combining expertise, minimizing costs, and using the strength of many cities acting in concert is exactly why TML is so very effective.

If TML is unable to do its job, the city will not have enough work to warrant a new employee, especially not every year or all year long. Existing staff, depending on the skill sets of the current incumbents could help fill that void. However, I assume each of those people already has a full workload, so additional assignments might not be practical. When I worked for a large county in Florida, after adopting a multi-page legislative program that I wrote following a series of commission meetings and hearings, we actually used a department director a few months each year to go to Tallahassee and lobby our legislative delegation. That was only possible, however, because his normal job did not keep him terribly busy, not something I see in Terrell. And in any case, the people to whom you would most likely entrust that sort of work are the ones probably already loaded down—good managers are usually assigned the most work. That also makes it very difficult for them to take on the role of monitor of state activity and city compliance.

Lobbying and monitoring is a very important function, to Terrell and every other city, especially in light of what appears to be an anti-city bias in the current Texas legislature. However, it is a difficult issue for us to address on our own without TML, which is able to watch over activities in Austin in every branch of state government, and do so every month and every year. A full-time job is too much, at least every other year, and even for parts of the legislative years. It is vital that we know what administrative decisions are to be made while they are still under consideration, but they do not happen all year on a full-time basis. Tacking on new duties to already busy directors will only slow down those directors, yet still not give legislative issues the attention they deserve and need. A part-time position will not have the expertise or authority required to act quickly. A lower paid, non-manager employee creates the likelihood there will be inadequate expertise or skills—and it is simply too much responsibility for someone that low on the wage scale.

I have found lobbyist positions in governmental and quasi-governmental entities paying in the range of $54,000 up to $120,000. For Terrell's purposes, $54,000 to hire someone in-house as a state relations coordinator, responsible for both monitoring mandates and lobbying legislators, does not get the skill set required to do an effective job. Based on the salaries and responsibilities of other city employees, a salary only estimate of $80,000 would probably be in order. We would have some expenses to budget on top of that too. These would include benefits, travel, professional organizations, the opportunity costs of an office and so forth, and other indirect support costs. The standard indirect rate of 40% covering TMRS Insurance and social security would up the salary plus benefits costs to $112,000. Other operating expenses such as hotel, per diem, cell phone and laptop would be hard to accomplish at $4,000 per month or $48,000 annually. I think we can logically estimate that an in-house coordinator, or a comparable group of multiple part-timers (if they even exist with the required expertise) and/or consultants, would cost Terrell an all-in number of no less than $160,000. Unfortunately, such a person(s) will almost certainly be less effective than TML has been historically, and at a much higher cost to the city and its citizens. Too much occurs in Austin to not have someone watching out for our interests all the time, but to cover the costs of a person to work only for us is not cost effective. And a single coordinator cannot effectively work with state agencies, the legislature, and state executives. It is too broad a spectrum of expertise for any one person, particularly when the need to communicate the compliance issues is factored in.

From the legislature's perspective, the present system is infinitely more efficient too. By grouping cities together, there is a smaller focal point for legislative input, as opposed to over 1,000 cities seeking the time, attention and energy of legislators individually. Of course, under that scenario, swamped senators and legislators will be forced to choose to whom they will provide time, effectively squeezing out all but the larger cities, whose priorities and needs are often not the same as the rest of us. There simply are no scenarios that work as well or at as low a cost as TML—it's why Terrell and hundreds of other cities and their locally elected councils are members and utilize their legislative services.

Again, it is worth a concluding reminder that TML's communication functions both telling legislators about local needs and telling local governments how to comply with the state. It is a cost saving for taxpayers that local governments use TML. By reducing TML, the legislature would be compelling the City of Terrell to add $160,000 in new costs and eliminate $3,487 in its current TML membership. If the legislation passes, I advise you to increase the City of Terrell budgeted expenses by $156,513 to pay for replacing the role of TML.

City of Terrell

Policy Brief

Topic: Hotel Occupancy Tax

Background: Hotel Occupancy Tax was introduced in 1959 with a 3% tax. The Texas Legislature passed two raises that brought the minimum rate to 6%. Based on the City qualifications, hotels in Texas have Hotel Occupancy Taxes of 6% to 17.5%.

Problem: Cities Historically Black Colleges and Universities are not treated equally under current law in comparison with cities containing other types of colleges and universities. This means that some cities can participate with their colleges for mutually beneficial tourist promotion and college visitation while similar sized cities with Historically Black Colleges and Universities are not allowed the opportunity for such cooperative “heads in beds” promotions.

Current Law: Most cities under 50,000 are at a 7% base Hotel Occupancy Tax, Terrell included. The existing “small cities with college bracket” allows an optional 9% Hotel Occupancy Tax up to City Council discretion. Unfortunately, the college definition used in state law, is a definition omitting Historically Black Colleges and Universities.

Funding: Cost neutral to current cities falling under this criteria. Tax rate increase will be paid by those who stay in hotels in the cities affected.

Proposed Solution: Allowing cities with Historically Black Colleges and Universities to get the benefits that other cities with colleges or universities that may opt into a higher Hotel Occupancy Tax rate at 9%. Four cities would be affected by this; Prairie View, Hawkins, Terrell and Marshall. The passage of a bill would give the option to the four cities to support cooperative tourism programs with their local Historically Black Colleges and Universities. This fixes what seems to be a simple oversight in the current bracket language and establishes equity between all small cities with colleges of a variety of types.

Requested follow up: Review draft bill of changes. Introduce legislation that would allow local governments to choose to pass an increase in their city.

Written draft of bill is attached.
